This book grew out of my Doctor of Philosophy in Law dissertation at Oxford University. Professor Paul Craig consistently supported this work over the years and gave it direction and purpose at times when it seemed to be too overwhelming. As my doctoral thesis supervisor he inspired by setting the highest personal example but was nevertheless tolerant of my failure to keep to most deadlines! At various points my examiners at Oxford gave critical inputs that shaped and re-shaped this work. So a special thanks to Professors Timothy Endicott, Nick Barber, Nicholas Bamforth, and Upendra Baxi.

The anonymous reviewers of this manuscript were encouraging and made useful suggestions and pointed out gaps in the coverage. The editors at OUP streamlined the text and put up with frequent delays in revising the work. I thank them for seeing value in this work and for seeing it through. Genuine thanks to my students, Ananth Padmanabhan, Don Mihsill, Madhav Khosla, and Sonam Kathuria, for providing valuable comments and editorial assistance at various points.

I thank my parents for their single minded insistence that I should complete this demanding task no matter what the odds and other competing concerns. Jayna for sacrificing our time together and for shielding me from domestic chores long enough for this book to get to print. Further, for providing me the urgent assistance to meet deadlines a big thank you to Jayna, Dev, and Nikita.

The two academic institutions I’ve been a part of while writing this work have often adjusted my teaching obligations to make this work happen. Heartfelt thanks to John Eekelaar at Pembroke College, Oxford and A. Jayagovind at the National Law School of India University, Bangalore.
