Acknowledgements

Several parts of this book have appeared in print or have been delivered as papers at conferences and seminars, usually in slightly different forms from those incorporated here. ‘The Birth of Ascendancy’ was read to the 1981 University of Essex conference on the sociology of literature, and is included here by kind permission of the conference committee. My analysis of The Absentee had its origins in a seminar paper read in the School of English, University of Leeds in 1978; Professor John O. McCormick of Rutgers University made a number of very useful comments on that early draft. The discussion of James Joyce expands on a paper prepared for the Joyce centenary conference at the University of Leeds—that paper was published in James Joyce and Modern Literature (ed. W. J. McCormack and A. J. Stead, published by Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982). As guest editor of Crane Bag Seamus Deane published versions of the two accounts of W. B. Yeats, and I am grateful for his advice and cooperation in shaping and reshaping them.
Much of the material covered by Ascendancy and Tradition has, over the years, formed the basis for discussion in my postgraduate seminar in the School of English, University of Leeds. I owe a debt of friendship and support to all the students who have taken part in my weekly airing of these problems and obsessions. Though I recognize the self-defeating quality of such lists, I also want to thank many good friends for their support and encouragement—Christopher Cassin, Neil Cornwell, Declan D’Estelle Roe, David Dickson, Kate Flint, Teri Garvey, Mary King, Sean O'Hagan, Sarah Ward-Perkins, and John Woods. At the appropriate points in my annotations, I acknowledge debts to Professor J. C. Beckett, Arthur Harwood Grayson, Professor R. B. McDowell, and William O'Sullivan for their assistance in matters of detail. The errors which remain are my responsibility and my pretext for further work in the field.

A grant from the Una Ellis-Fermor memorial fund, administered from the University of London, enabled me to travel \( \text{(p.viii)} \) from Leeds to Ireland during the writing of parts of this book. I am happy to acknowledge this assistance together with vacation grants from the School of English, University of Leeds, provided throughout the years of my teaching there.
