(p.v) Acknowledgements

Aubrey took great pleasure in acknowledging the many debts he owed to others, with phrases such as ‘this I had from’ this or that friend often recurring in his manuscripts. In the same spirit, I take real satisfaction in being able to acknowledge here the many helps and kindesses I have met with in the six years of this book’s gestation.

When the ideas for this project first began to germinate during an MSt at the University of Oxford, I was fortunate to be supported by the Clarendon Fund. Subsequently a studentship from the Mellon Foundation through the Cultures of Knowledge project allowed me to continue forward to the DPhil and a thesis addressing Aubrey and his antiquarianism. Finally, the British Academy generously awarded me a Postdoctoral Fellowship at the University of St Andrews as this book was being finished.
Throughout the course of this project I have been met with unfailing kindness, courtesy, and assistance far beyond the line of duty from the staff of the Bodleian Library, British Library, All Souls, Balliol, and Worcester College libraries, and Wiltshire Archaeological and Natural History Society Library. The Bodleian Libraries, University of Oxford, also kindly allowed the reproduction of several images from Aubrey’s manuscripts. I am especially grateful to Colin Harris, Russell Edwards, and all those who worked in Duke Humfrey’s Library and the interim special collections reading room in the Radcliffe Science Library for making my research in Oxford always a pleasure and often a joy.

This book began life as a doctoral thesis and I am indebted to my supervisor, Rhodri Lewis, for his support, his generosity, and his composition of far too many letters of reference, as well as for his incisive commentary and sound advice throughout the doctorate. My examiners, Noel Malcolm and Nigel Smith, were meticulous, thoughtful, and polymathic; I hope their wise suggestions for the evolution of this project from thesis to book are reflected in the following pages. During the writing of the thesis and beyond, William Poole was an invaluable mentor and friend, sharing his immense erudition and boundless enthusiasm for the continent of early modern learning with a younger scholar only beginning to explore its foreshores.

Mordechai Feingold, Anthony Ossa-Richardson, and Thomas Roebuck all read and commented upon portions of this work at various stages, while (p.vi) Kate Bennett, William Poole, and Amy Wallace read the final manuscript with wonderful attention to detail. I am immensely grateful to all of them for spotting errors, correcting typos, challenging my thinking, and improving this book. Conversations with Michael Hunter and Peter Davidson changed my thinking about Aubrey at crucial stages. For support during and beyond the thesis I am deeply indebted to Paulina Kewes, who has also looked on with a friendly eagle eye as it progressed from idea to reality. The final few months of the book’s composition were made far easier and more rewarding by the supportive and collegial environment provided by my new colleagues in the School of History at St Andrews.
I am very grateful to the Oxford English Monographs Committee for recommending a long and inward-looking thesis for publication and to the two anonymous reviewers commissioned by Oxford University Press whose advice was invaluable in turning that thesis into a rather shorter and more accessible book. Rachel Platt guided the book through the initial stages of the editorial process and Eleanor Collins saw it through to its end. I am grateful to both for their hard work and support.

My parents, Kenneth and Gloria Williams, have provided constant love and support throughout the years in which I was engaged with Aubrey. Their presence has always made it easier. In the latter part of the project, my parents-in-law, Vic and Sue Hollis, offered laughter, companionship, and a home away from home with unstinting generosity. Finally, these pages could never have been written without Dawn Hollis. At every turn she provided proofreading, thoughtful and challenging commentary, and fresh ideas, while always being there on the other side of our respective projects at the end of a long day. She has read these pages more times than anyone should have to endure, but most of all I am grateful to her for her love, which has made all the difference.
