My primary debt is to the students in the various seminars on love poetry I have taught over the years. Many of the ideas and readings in this book were developed during those classes, which were a joy to teach. I am extremely grateful also to Stefanie Markovits and Marion Thain, first for the invaluable advice that they offered as anonymous readers for Oxford University Press, and second for their willingness to forgo that anonymity, which allowed me to call on them for further assistance. I am deeply indebted to them both, as well as to Jacqueline Norton at OUP, who has encouraged my work on this project since its inception.

I began writing this book during a semester of leave from Columbia University and completed it during another, and I wish to thank Columbia for its support, as well as my many colleagues in the English Department who have offered helpful suggestions along the way. In particular, I am grateful to Matthew Margini (also a notable member of the first-named group above) for his learned and extremely useful comments on Chapter 4, and to Jim Adams for generously reading the entire typescript when it was complete.

My deepest obligation of all is to my family. To my parents, Bill and Antoinette Gray, I am forever grateful. The love they have given me throughout my life is of a different kind from the love that is treated in this book, but it is the ground and basis of all. Were it not for that, I would never have written this. Emmett Gray, who made his appearance between Chapters 4 and 5, cannot be said to have contributed materially to the writing of this book—except in the very real sense of giving me the greatest possible incentive to finish it, so I could spend even more time with him. Finally, to my wife, Shira Backer, I would express how much I owe, in this as in everything I do. But I cannot possibly express it, and you know it already.
