I TAKE this opportunity to record the numerous debts which I have incurred in writing this book. My research would not have been possible without the generous support of three institutions. The Soros Foundation awarded me the Visiting Scholarship that brought me to Oxford for the year 1991–2. Jesus College Oxford awarded me its Overseas Graduate Scholarship for the years 1992–5, when I carried out the greater part of my work for the Oxford D.Phil. thesis, 'Authorship and Appropriation: Conceptions of Playwriting in England, 1660–1710', of which this book is a revised version. Both the thesis and the book have been completed at University College Oxford, which elected me to a J. A. Pye Junior Research Fellowship in 1995. I have felt very lucky in my membership of my two Oxford colleges, which have been the warmest of homes. At Univ. the friendship and conversation of three colleagues, Dr Helen Cooper, Dr Leslie Mitchell, and Mr Alexander Murray have been a special blessing.

Friendship and scholarship have merged in other settings too, particularly the Huntington Library, where I was an Andrew W. Mellon Foundation Fellow in the summer of 1992. There as elsewhere I have learnt how much difference the helpfulness of librarians can make to an inexperienced researcher. In that respect I am particularly conscious of my debt to the staff of Duke Humfrey in the Bodleian Library.
Acknowledgements

The examiners of my thesis, Professor Anne Barton and Dr David Womersley, offered me valuable advice and encouragement. A number of other scholars have given freely to me of their time and expertise, commenting on my drafts, answering queries, sharing their ideas, or enabling me to read their work before its publication. Prominent among them are Professor Richard Dutton, Professor Margreta de Grazia, Dr Lucyle Hook, Dr Derek Hughes, Mr Nicholas Jacobs, Dr Mervyn Jannetta, Dr John Jowett, Professor Richard Proudfoot, Mr Richard Rowland, and Mr William St Clair. Above all, I wish to thank Professors Robert D. Hume and Blair Worden for their immense generosity and kindness.

(p.viii) I shall not forget the wisdom and support of Professor John Carey, who supervised me in my year as a Soros Visiting Student and encouraged my interest in Restoration drama. I have been extremely fortunate to be taught by Professor D. F. McKenzie, whose course on bibliography and textual criticism opened a new intellectual world to me, and whose enthusiasm and friendship have been a sustaining force. During the later stages of my thesis I have greatly profited from the perceptive comments of Professor Paul Hammond who took over as my supervisor on the death of Dr Harriett Hawkins. Harriett was a wonderful teacher and a wonderful friend. I owe her more, and miss her more, than I can say.

In the course of seeing this book through the press, I have had many occasions for gratitude to Jason Freeman and Sophie Goldsworthy of OUP, and to my patient and expert copy-editor, Janet Moth.
